From indications of popular partiality at the North, it appears that this distinguished statesman stands the best chance of receiving the democratic nomination at Baltimore. The action in his favor of both the democratic committees in the city of New York. and of a meeting just held at Albany, evinces that he has a much greater popularity in the Empire State than was believed to exist; and although a majority of her delegation to the National Convention is thought to be in favor of Governor Marcy, yet it would seem General Cass has more popularity with her people than any other prominent democrat. Throughout the West he is unquestionably the most general favorite, and will receive the conventional suffrages of all the States, except, perhaps, in the first instance. Kentucky, which will vote for General Butler, and Illinois, which will support Judge Douglas. The New England States, with but one or two exceptions, will also most probably vote for General Cass; and in the South, Maryland and Louisiana have positively indicated him as their first choice.

It is well known that our own preferences are for Mr. Buchanan : and we still think that his nomination would be the most fortunate and judicious that could be made-that it would disembarrass the democracy of some old and unpropitious prejudices, and restore harmony of feeling and concert of action throughout the party, especially in the South. But Europe still. we have no hostility to the great statesman of the West. We regard him now, as we did in 1848, as a true patriot, an enlightened statesman, a firm and conscientious devotee to the constitution, and one of the most gifted and highly cultured intellects of our country. His career in the Senate has placed him more nearly in that lofty category of philosophic and oratorical statesmanship so long held without a peer by Calhoun. Webster, and Clay, than any other member of that assemblage. Wright, Benton, conspicuous there for abilities and eloquence, but they met not such a wide and unquestioned recognition of superiority as has been awarded to General tion with him; and this reputation is European as well as American. The principal objection to General Cass at the South is based upon his Nicholson letter. His views do still less if he could. as to what was called derisively "squatter sovereighty" met with but little approval. They were, and regarded abstract questions rather of a judical views General Cass was led by the very tendencies doubtable tail! of his Jeffersonism-by the strictness of his construction of the constitution. He would not admit federal authority over the Territories, further than is specifically granted in the national charter, and therefore he left a vast residoum of powers to be exercised somewhere-and this he took to be by the people, as was done first in Oregon, and subsequently in California. The question is a difficult one, and need not be discussed. It is now, in the positions of things, and must henceforth be, purely a historic one. No reflection, certainly, can be made upon the patriotism or republican orthodoxy of General Cass for the opinions he held, and which he has recently explain-
